You can divide your paper into 4 parts which will make it easier for you to organize your paper. These four parts are the introduction, the summary, the analysis, and the conclusion.

So, let's start with the introduction. As for any piece of writing which requires a proper introduction, we already know that the basic purpose of it is to provide the background information about a topic that we are discussing. In the same manner, the introduction of a film analysis paper also provides background information about the film that you are writing about and some general information about the film. It includes the movie name, the date of its release, the name of the director of the movie, etc. Apart from this, it also includes some information about the maker of the film which can give some information to be utilized in the analysis of the film that you are discussing. A well-practiced essay writer would know that the introduction part provides the background information about the topic we write about. The same is the case in a film analysis paper in which we write about the theme of the movie or the main ideas around which the movie is made. You must point out what you found interesting about the movie. Lastly, you must end your introduction with a thesis statement which should ideally and most specifically establish what you ought to discuss in your entire paper in the subsequent sections.

Coming to the next section which is the summary; here you need to summarize the main plot of the movie in your own words and in a manner in which you make sure that no information is left out. There are various methods to do this but one of the most successful ways of doing it is by thinking that your supervisor who has assigned you this paper has not watched the movie. It will subconsciously force you to think about every detail that is discussed in the movie and you will make sure that you do not miss out on any important information about the movie. Similarly, you can discuss any personal opinion that you might have regarding the movie, about a specific detail of it, etc. One thing that needs to be ensured is that your personal take on any aspect of the movie must be supported with examples and evidence in the form of quotations from the movie.

Then we come to the analysis part of our paper. At this point, if you are pondering over and still asking yourself, "will I be able to write my essay?" then the answer to this is absolutely, yes! You have made it to this point, there is no point in thinking that you still won't be able to do so. Furthermore, we will guide you exactly in how to write the analysis portion of your essay. So just keep going.

The analysis section, as evident from its name, is the part of your paper that includes your own critical analysis and how you will evaluate the theme and other creative elements that are portrayed in the movie. Your analysis must be substantiated with claims and evidence from the movie. In the sequence in which it is discussed, your analysis section should include the scenario, the direction of the movie., of course, the acting, its music, and the visual elements. The scenario part should discuss the dialogues, the script, the development of the characters, and the scenes of the movie. While discussing the direction part, keep in mind to draw a comparison between the director's other films and this film to provide a better understanding of the director's methods of direction. This will subsequently help you in developing better conclusions. Or you can take help from writemyessay.help to write perfect conclusions.
